BRIEF OVERVIEW OF THE EARLY YEARS OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN AUSTIN AND TRAVIS COUNTY

In the mid-1800s, the citizens of Austin had conflicting views on whose responsibility it was to pay to educate children, who should decide whether a child should be educated, and what children should be taught. European immigrants, such as the Germans, and those from the North believed in public education systems supported and run by the state or local government. New citizens from other southern states felt that it was the right and responsibility of the parent to decide if and how their children should be educated. Nobody wanted to pay extra taxes for education. Before formal establishment of public schools in Austin, education was provided by an assortment of small, private, tuition-charging academies.

The Common School Law of 1854 signed by Governor Pease called for the organization of common schools, provided a system for payment of tuition for indigent and orphaned children, set up rules that allowed private schools to convert to common schools, and provided money to be apportioned to counties based on an annual scholastic census. Each district was responsible for building a school building, but no money was provided to finance this endeavor. This bill appeased most people because the money came from a state funded account (not taxes) and communities controlled how, what, and who was being taught.

In Austin, it does not appear that any of the private schools converted to a common school to take advantage of the apportioned monies. Nor were any new school buildings built, but this is not surprising given the apportionment was only $0.62 per student. The law was amended in 1856 to eliminate some of the bureaucracy and allowed any school (even private schools) and teachers that met certain requirements to be entitled to receive state funds. The private schools came and went, with most of them closing during the Civil War years. No state funds were distributed to the counties after 1861. After the war, private institutions were reestablished.

The Constitution of 1869, written by the Republicans that came into power during the Reconstruction period, made free public education a priority. The School Law of 1871 was passed, which was one of the most highly centralized systems of compulsory education in the United States. The State Board of Education was given the power to make rules and regulations for the establishment of schools, examine and appoint teachers, fix salaries, define the course of study, and select textbooks. The new law also included additional taxation, which previous leaders had promised would never happen. Jacob DeGress, a Northern soldier who had no education experience, was appointed superintendent of public instruction by Governor Edmund Davis. This unpopular law also violated what was considered to be the parent's natural right to decide if a child should be sent to school and what they should learn. Despite the outrage of many of its citizens, the State persevered and opened the first free public schools in Austin, and Texas, on September 4, 1871.

The Southern Democrats came back into power in 1873 and repealed the majority of the improvements that had been made to the educational system in Texas since Governor Pease had passed the Common School Law of 1854. Local districts resumed control of the schools and the Superintendent of Public Instruction became an advisory position. The new law was confusing and the amount of money insufficient. According to a report submitted by the County Superintendent of Public Schools of Travis County on August 12, 1875, no public schools had yet been established in Austin, although school buildings were being built in the rest of Travis County.

African American communities created community schools to replace the public schools closed by the new government. The 1877 City Directory states that there were 3 schools for African American students. Travis County Court Record C indicates that at least some African American teachers were receiving state funds in 1876, and presumably they were teachers at these 3 schools. Additional state funds were used to build two buildings, one in Wheatville and one east of the city, that were ready to open in 1877. By 1879-1880 the number of schools for African American students had increased to 5.

The apportionment for Austin from the state school fund and the revenue raised through taxes was not enough money to build a school in the years directly following the Democrats' revision of Texas school law. Local officials allowed the money to accumulate with the county treasurer, and in 1875 announced that a school would be erected at the site designated for a University. In 1876, just as Austin completed building its first school building with public funds, the Texas Legislature passed a law allowing cities to establish their own public schools. But in Austin, there was opposition to taking the management of schools out of the hands of the parents and the community system. In the mid-1870s, the Austin Graded School Community was organized by parents, and the board of directors worked to break down the prejudice against public or graded schools. The new Austin school building was used for a community school that was free, as long as there was state money to pay the teachers; generally, parents had to pay tuition for the second half of the year.

In 1879, the state school law was amended to allow the schools to be placed under the control of a board of six trustees elected by qualified voters rather than city council. This distinction seems to have been the tipping point that allowed school advocates and community leaders such as A. P. Wooldridge, J. W. Graham, J. B. Rector, John T. Allan, Swante Palm and Z. T. Fulmore to campaign and sway public opinion enough to require that the issue be brought to a vote.

Change came in 1880, when Austin citizens voted, and the City of Austin assumed control of the public free schools within the city limits. The Austin Public Schools opened on September 12, 1881, with 500 students in attendance. By the close of the school year the enrollment had increased to 1,328 (although average attendance was 806) with 26 teachers in charge. Schools were located in eleven buildings throughout the city but only three of the buildings were owned by the Board of Trustees. Other buildings were rented churches and commercial sites. Students were assigned to schools by ward location and race.

Schools were originally arranged into three levels, and, unlike today, it was not assumed that students would complete all three levels. Superintendent Wooldridge's descriptions provide insight into the expectations of education at the time:

The Primary level (1st-4th grades) taught the fundamentals and "if a boy or girl is forced to close his school education with what is taught in these grades, he can enter into practical life, fitted to become a useful citizen...."

Grammar (5th-8th grades) was the next level which added literature and science to the curriculum, and “beyond which, as a rule, probably not more than one pupil in ten, who starts to school ever goes.”

High School (9th-11th grades) was the “pride and boast of any true citizen” that provided a “thorough education in the usual English branches, in the elements of physical science, literature, higher mathematics, the classics and modern languages--such as will enable him to enter the university....”

By the end of the year 1900, Austin Public Schools owned seven schools for white students (Bickler, Pease, Palm, Wooldridge, Fulmore, Baker, and a new High School building); four schools for African American students (Roberston Hill, Gregorytown, West Austin, Wheatville); and rented only two schools, one in South Austin for African American students and the Garland (First Ward) School for Mexican American students. While this was a vast improvement over the conditions when the schools had opened 19 years earlier with 2 owned buildings and 8 rented buildings, the schools were still overcrowded. During the early 1900s, the Board of Trustees regularly asked for tax increases, each time voted down by the citizens of Austin. This led to the closure of the Garland School, teacher layoffs, a shortening of the school year in 1901.

In 1903, Arthur N. McCallum, Sr., was appointed superintendent of schools, and he immediately began lobbying for additional bond issues to support the school. In an address to City Council in January of 1910, Superintendent McCallum described the dire situation in the schools. In addition to the shortened school year, students were two to a desk and some schools were only half day with one grade coming in the morning and the other grade attending in the afternoon. McCallum called for an election for issuance of $75,000 in school bonds and warned if this bond did not pass and the schools had to close early, over 60 students wouldn't graduate and would not be acceptable as freshmen at the University the next year. His thirty-nine years of stewardship saw the schools rapidly expand, and by 1942, there were thirty-two schools and 16,128 students.

The 1910 bond approval would prove to be the turning point with the electorate and every bond issue to support the Austin Public Schools placed before the voters for the next forty years, over 20 million dollars, was passed. Starting in the 1940s, there was discussion in the community about separating the schools financially from the city, organizing an independent school district, and giving the Board of Trustees the authority to call elections, to levy and collect taxes, and to perform other administrative duties. In the 1950s the school population was increasing by a rate of 2,000 students each year, and the system had grown to more than thirty schools when the Board of Trustees finally pushed for the vote on the separation of the schools from city government. On April 30, 1955, with a vote of 2,722 for to 663 against, the Austin Independent School District was born.

Likewise, in Travis County, the schools were dependent upon the local government (county) and the state to provide money for operating costs. An act of legislation in 1887 created the Travis County School Superintendent's office to act as the administrative head of the Travis County Common School Districts (also referred to as Travis County rural schools). In the early years the individual school decided upon the length of the school year and the number of teachers. This was often dependent upon how much money the community could raise from taxes.

In the 1950s and 1960s, because of financial issues, various Travis County school districts began either consolidating into the Austin School Independent School District or creating their own independent school districts (for example, Eanes Independent School District, Manor Independent School District, and Pflugerville Independent School District). But some areas had common school districts that were still under the jurisdiction of the Travis County superintendent and the school board (who were unable to revalue property for school-tax purposes), and in the 1950s, some schools were starting to close because they could not operate on county tax values. In 1952, there were thirteen common school districts, but by 1976 only one remained. In 1978, the position of Travis County school superintendent was abolished.

The schools in Austin and Travis County were originally segregated, with both African Americans and the majority of Mexicans taught in separate schools. Although the commonly termed “Jim Crow” laws applied specifically to African Americans and not Mexican Americans, local interpretation of those laws allowed for segregation of Mexican American school children as well. White schools in Austin received a disproportionate amount of the school budget and teachers at African American schools were paid less than their white counterparts. As evidenced by an Austin American article from February 8, 1925, the average capital investment per pupil in white schools was $181.89; in African American schools $84.07; and in Mexican schools $65.31. The school superintendent and the Board of Trustees, by comparing Austin’s African American and Mexican American schools to similar schools in Texas, claimed that Austin was providing a good educational experience. Jason McDonald, in his book Racial Dynamics in Early Twentieth-Century Austin, Texas, conceded that while it was true that African American and Mexican children were most likely being better educated as compared to rest of Texas, these students were not afforded as good of an educational experience as the local white students.

In 1895, there were five public schools for African American children—four elementary schools and one high school in the City of Austin. As the African American population in Austin shifted into East Austin, the schools did as well. By 1940, there were eight schools for African Americans; all but two schools were located in East Austin. In the same year, Travis County listed thirty-one schools for African American students, although twenty-five of them were one-teacher schools, and only three taught grades one through eleven.

The major event leading to integration of African American students was the U.S. Supreme Court’s 1954 decision in Brown vs. Board of Education. The AISD Board of Trustees originally adopted a policy of integration through choice of the individual student. In 1955, thirteen African American students became the first to integrate Austin’s high schools—seven at Stephen F. Austin High; five at William B. Travis High; and one at A.N. McCallum High. Integration of the junior-high and elementary schools was slower to happen, with elementary schools remaining segregated until the early 1960s. Until 1970, the “freedom of choice” policy, with minor modifications, was maintained, which resulted in eight schools remaining all African American, while ten other schools that were considered “minority schools” were attended predominately by Mexican American students or a combination of Mexican American and African American students. In 1968, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) found that the Austin school district was not in compliance with the Civil Rights Act and that further changes were needed. In response, AISD adopted mandatory one-way busing in 1971. After complaints that this put the entire burden on students of color, two-way busing was begun in 1979 and lasted until 1986, when the district was released from court supervision.

The First Ward “Mexican” School (later renamed the Garland School) at 2nd and Nueces Streets opened in the 1880s but closed in 1901 because of system-wide fiscal problems. Because the segregation practices of the Austin Public School system regarding children of Mexican descent were not well defined, it is unclear how many children of Mexican heritage attended their neighborhood schools and how many were denied educational opportunities after the Garland School closed in the early 1900s. There is evidence that some Mexican-descent students integrated into some of the Austin schools after this closure. But because of the influx of immigrants fleeing the Mexican Revolution and the compulsory attendance law that was to take effect on January 1, 1917, in 1916, the City of Austin Board of Trustees opened for its “non-English speaking community” a school called the West Avenue School. Parents of the children of Mexican descent assigned to the West Avenue School protested to the school board that they didn’t want their children attending school so far from home. The board voted to continue with the non-English speaking school, and the superintendent promised that students would be placed in neighborhood schools as soon as they had learned the necessary English skills. In the early 1920s, the school board opened another school for Mexican-descent students, and it eventually became the Comal School. Thirteen years later, the Zavala School (with overlapping attendance zones with Metz) was opened, and it was announced that students of Mexican heritage from Bickler, Comal, Palm and Metz would go to school in this new building. Beginning in the 1940s, there was a gradual shift in attitude, and Mexican American students began attending their neighborhood schools again. The issue of whether AISD intentionally segregated Mexican American students through policy and school-site selection was raised in the HEW and U.S. Justice Department’s case against AISD (United States v. State of Texas) in the 1970s. The U.S. District Court found that there had been de-facto segregation, and the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the segregation had been de-jure. After three appeals, the Fifth Circuit upheld its ruling that AISD had intentionally segregated Mexican American students.

This list is by no means an exhaustive list of every title held by the Austin History Center that relates to the public-school system; that can be accomplished by a keyword search in the Austin Public Library online catalog. This list is an attempt to identify General Collection items that provide a historical perspective or address significant policy issues.
